FORMAT: 15s / free rhythm / 1 seamless match cut / uninterrupted camera movement until the cut + action beginning immediately from frame one SUBJECTS: A solitary woman armed with a sword, dressed in worn fur and leather survival gear, struggles against a huge polar bear using raw, two-handed defensive movement. Later it is revealed that the same woman is inside her home wearing relaxed indoor clothing, where a VR headset appears only after the match cut and is removed in one clear motion. ENVIRONMENT:

Open frozen tundra beneath harsh winter daylight, wind dragging powder snow across pale blue ice. The sequence transitions into a modest, lived-in interior through a carefully aligned visual match. The biting cold, visible breath, and glare of the wilderness give way to warm clutter, window light, and a faint glow from the game. MOOD: Immediate life-or-death intensity that abruptly resolves into everyday reality while preserving physical continuity of motion. COLOR LOGIC: Naturalistic cinematic film print emulation. TIMELINE 0:00–0:07 The shot begins instantly in motion. A handheld wide shot collapses toward a mediumclose framing as the woman retreats across frozen ground while the polar bear charges through blowing snow. The camera runs beside the action at roughly eye level, beginning near 28mm and gradually tightening toward 35mm, slightly unstable but close enough to keep both figures physically grounded in frame. The bear rapidly closes distance while she plants her feet, recoils, and keeps the sword positioned defensively between them. SFX: howling wind, boots grinding against ice, deep animal roar, fabric strain, blade slicing through air, snow scraping across the surface. Hard winter sunlight side-lights the terrain, casting long blue shadows across the ice. 0:07–0:11 The movement continues without a cut, pushing into a tight close-up as the bear lunges into the final distance. Claws reach toward her shoulders and its jaws dominate the edge of frame. At the height of the attack, a man's voice calls out: "Karla…" then louder: "KARLA." She answers with a tired "Off." At that exact response, time collapses into slow motion. Snow particles hang nearly still, the bear suspended mid-strike, while she alone continues moving at normal speed. The camera slowly arcs around her face in a clockwise drift. Unimpressed rather than frightened, she lets the sword fall and raises both empty hands toward her temples in one smooth interruption gesture. No headset or device exists in this frozen world. The camera maintains identical face scale, hand height, head tilt, lens distance, and rotational drift until the match cut. SFX: fabric tension approaching impact, the distant voice calling Karla… KARLA, her quiet Off, wind stretching and fading toward silence. Bright winter light catches suspended snow crystals around her face. 0:11–0:15 MATCH CUT. The close-up aligns perfectly with the new setting. As her hands pass through the same screen position, the frozen tundra becomes a small home interior. The camera keeps the same clockwise drift and framing as the motion continues uninterrupted. For the first time, a VR headset is visible over her eyes. She grips both sides and pulls it upward in a single smooth action. The camera widens into a medium shot as the headset lifts above her forehead. She steps into a compact living room wearing loose indoor clothing. The handheld orbit reveals couch edges, scattered blankets, and cool daylight from a window. Her body language relaxes into mild irritation. She looks toward the unseen voice, rolls her eyes slightly upward, and says: “What is it.” Lens: 35mm, natural spherical look. SFX: headset strap stretching, plastic shifting, quiet room ambience, soft footstep on the floor, faint game audio fading out, her breathing settling, her dry voice asking “What is it.” Indoor daylight replaces the stark winter contrast.
