Camera first, hard requirement: first-person POV from the eye line of the person walking, ultra-wide lens with slight distortion, the camera walks forward with a gentle step bob in every second of the film and never stops. Our own two bare hands and forearms enter from the bottom of frame. Vertical 9:16.

Look: photoreal, a busy city street in clean daylight with sharp shadows, natural colours, crisp contrast. Plain unbranded storefronts. No text, no logos, no readable signs.

THE RULE: after the snap, everyone and everything except our hands and our walking camera is completely motionless, like wax statues. Not slow motion. Nothing drifts. Each object moves only while our hand is touching it, and it stays exactly where we leave it.

0:00 to 0:02. First frame in motion: walking fast through a dense crowd that streams past on both sides, pigeons lifting off the pavement ahead, a woman ahead-left throwing a cup of water from a clear plastic cup at a man, the water leaving the cup. Our right hand comes up into frame and snaps its fingers.

0:02 to 0:05. On the snap, all sound cuts out and everything stops dead. The crowd is held mid-step. Pigeons hang in the air with wings spread. The water is a glittering arc in the air. We keep walking and thread between the frozen people, shoulders passing close to the lens. Our left hand pushes one hanging pigeon aside, and it stays where it is pushed.

0:05 to 0:08. We reach the water arc. Our right index finger pokes one hanging droplet, and it wobbles and shifts one hand-width, then hangs. Our left hand takes the clear cup out of the woman's held-out fingers, scoops it through the arc from end to end so the water collects back in it, and sets the full cup upright on a cafe table beside her.

0:08 to 0:11. Ahead-right, a man's phone hangs in the air a hand above the pavement, just dropped, his fingers open above it. Our right hand lifts it and places it back into his open fingers, closing them around it, one finger at a time. A red balloon hangs above a little boy, its string out of reach. Our left hand pulls it down by the string and ties it around his wrist.

0:11 to 0:13. We turn to look back at the street. Both hands come up in frame and the right hand snaps again. Time slams back with a boom and a blast of air. Every pigeon bursts upward past the lens, the crowd surges, coats and hair snap into motion.

0:13 to 0:15. We keep walking backwards, away. The woman throws her arm forward with no cup in it and stares at her empty hand. The man grips his phone, frowning at it. The balloon tugs the boy's wrist upward and he laughs. A pigeon flashes past the lens. The film ends with the crowd in full motion and our walk still going. No held final shot.

Sound: city roar in the first 2 seconds, total silence after the snap with only our footsteps and our breathing and one tiny droplet sound, then a huge bass drop and full chaos at the second snap.
