Reference binding: @Image1 is KARLA: take the face, long dark braid and build, the fur and leather gear for the tundra and the grey sweater for the home; ignore the sheet layout and the plain background.

Camera first, hard requirement: side-on handheld running alongside the action at eye level, 28mm tightening to 35mm, close enough that the woman fills at least half the frame height from the first frame. Vertical 9:16. No wide opening.

always faces screen-right, towards the bear. The bear is on screen-right and always faces screen-left, towards her, with its whole head clear of her silhouette. The sword is always between them.

CAST, from the reference sheet: KARLA, same face in both worlds, long dark braid, no hood. On the tundra she wears worn fur and leather and fingerless leather gloves, with bare fingers visible closed around the sword hilt, no mittens. In the home she wears a loose plain grey sweater with the same braid. Look: photoreal naturalistic film print. No text, no logos.

0:00 to 0:02. First frame in motion. Hard winter sun on pale blue ice, wind dragging powder snow. Karla backs up fast with both hands on the hilt, looking at the bear. The huge polar bear, coarse wet fur, sprints at her from screen-right and covers 4 metres in under a second, snow bursting from its paws. Her breath shows.

0:02 to 0:05. The bear swipes with its right paw. She sees it and blocks. Claws scrape down the blade with a shriek and a line of sparks, and the blow drives her sliding back a metre, her boots cutting two grooves in the snow. She plants her feet, jaw clenched, eyes on its eyes.

0:05 to 0:08. The camera pushes into a tight two-shot. The bear rears and lunges, jaws open at the top right of frame, paws reaching for her shoulders, and hot breath blows the snow off her collar. A man's voice calls from nowhere: "Karla..." then louder: "KARLA." Her eyes close in tired irritation.

0:08 to 0:10. She says flatly: "Off." The bear and the snow slow to almost nothing, the bear held in mid-lunge, flakes hanging around her face, and she alone moves at normal speed. She opens her hands, and the sword drops and sticks upright in the snow. She turns her face to camera three-quarter, unimpressed, and raises both empty hands to her temples, fingers spread. No headset exists in this world.

0:10. HARD CUT on a single frame, no dissolve, no crossfade, no double exposure. Same face scale, same head tilt, same hand positions in frame. Everything else changes at once: a small lived-in living room in cool window daylight, couch and blankets behind her, grey sweater. A white VR headset is now on her eyes, and her hands are gripping its sides exactly where her hands just were.

0:10 to 0:13. Her hands keep moving without pause and pull the headset up and off in one clear motion, the strap dragging her hair, and lower it to chest height. Her hands stay on it. Her eyes open, and the same face is revealed.

0:13 to 0:15. Medium close-up. She rolls her eyes up, turns her head to screen-left towards a doorway with no one visible, and says drily: "What is it." She is already tossing the headset onto the couch and starting to walk towards screen-left. The film ends mid-step. No held final shot.

Sound: howling wind, boots on ice, deep roar, claws shrieking on steel. Wind stretches to silence at "Off". At the cut, quiet room tone and faint game sound fading. Clear lip-sync on her lines.
