Camera first: early-2000s handheld DV camcorder held by a friend walking behind and beside her, strong natural shake, drifting framing, autofocus hunting, faded colour, soft image, one or two clumsy zooms. One continuous take, no edit. Vertical 9:16.

CAST: a young Korean woman in her early 20s, black wavy hair in a messy side ponytail, a plain pastel-blue T-shirt, loose white pajama pants, a thin silver necklace, flat brown sandals with a single strap and a toe post. She carries a small cloth shopping bag with one milk carton in it. Natural face, real skin, light makeup.

SET: a quiet Korean residential lane on a warm summer morning, old concrete walls, potted plants, bicycles, overhead wires, laundry hanging.

0:00 to 0:03. Already walking towards camera with the bag, smiling. Her right foot steps down and the toe post pops out of the sandal's sole, the strap flapping loose. She stops and looks down.

0:03 to 0:06. The camera tilts down, the sandal large in frame. She crouches, foot still in the sandal, and pushes the toe post back into its hole in the sole with her thumb. She stands, takes one step, and the post pops out again.

0:06 to 0:09. She crouches again and presses the post in hard with both thumbs, frowning. She stands, takes one step, and it pops out. She bursts out laughing.

0:09 to 0:12. Still laughing, she steps out of both sandals, picks them up together in one hand, the milk bag in the other, and starts walking barefoot on the warm concrete.

0:12 to 0:15. She turns her head to the camera as she walks, face a third of the frame height, still laughing, and says: "I only went out for milk." The film ends mid-step, the camera following her down the sunny lane.

Sound: birds, footsteps on concrete, bare feet slapping, a distant bicycle bell, the friend's soft laugh behind the camera. One line of English dialogue, lip-synced. No music.
