Camera first: medium shots at standing eye height, 35mm, handheld like a phone filmed by a friend on the pavement, then tracking alongside. The picture is always one single full frame. Vertical 9:16.

STYLE: natural cinematic street footage, bright morning light, real skin and fabric. No text and no logos anywhere; the rickshaw has plain blank plates.

CAST: BRIDE, an adult Indian woman in her late twenties, a heavy red lehenga with gold embroidery and a very wide skirt, a red dupatta over her head, gold jewellery, mehndi on her hands. DRIVER, a middle-aged man in a khaki shirt, eyes on the road.

SET: a busy Mumbai street in the morning, shops, parked scooters. A black and yellow auto rickshaw at the kerb, with a metal bar along the top of its back and a flat back bumper.

0:00 to 0:03. Already moving in the first frame. BRIDE gathers her huge skirt in both arms and pushes it at the rickshaw's door, but the skirt is wider than the door and puffs back out.

0:03 to 0:06. One continuous shot, no edit. Over the DRIVER's shoulder, his hand and wrist on the handlebar large in frame, BRIDE behind at the side still wrestling her skirt. He twists the throttle grip. The rickshaw starts to roll forward at walking pace.

0:06 to 0:09. One continuous shot, no edit. BRIDE hurries after it and steps up onto the back bumper, both hands on the metal bar, smiling, steady on both feet.

0:09 to 0:12. Tracking alongside: the rickshaw rolls slowly down the street, BRIDE standing on the back bumper, one hand on the bar, the lehenga and dupatta streaming out behind her.

0:12 to 0:15. Close from beside the rickshaw, her face a third of the frame height, three-quarter view, eyes on the people on the pavement. She lets go with one hand and gives the street a slow queen's wave, beaming, and calls out: "Don't stop, I'm late!" The film ends with the rickshaw still rolling.

Sound: street traffic, horns, the rickshaw's two-stroke putter, bangles jingling, people on the pavement laughing. One line of English dialogue, lip-synced, BRIDE only. No music.
