Camera first: medium shots at standing eye height, 35mm, gentle handheld, one tilt down to his hands, the last beat a slow push-in. The picture is always one single full frame. Vertical 9:16.

STYLE: bright stylised 3D game look, toy-like chunky shapes, saturated colours, sunny sky. An invented village, not any real game. No text, no logos and no interface anywhere.

CAST: PEP, an original background villager, a man in his late twenties with a round face, freckles, a plain grey tunic and a straw hat, holding a wooden broom. HEROES: three adventurers in shiny armour who run past behind him; the one in front wears red armour.

SET: a cobbled village square with a well in the middle, wooden houses, flower boxes.

MAP: PEP stands screen-left in the foreground. The HEROES run from screen-right to screen-left behind him, past the well.

0:00 to 0:03. Already moving in the first frame. PEP faces the square, his side to camera, sweeping the cobbles, bored. Behind him the HEROES run past the well.

0:03 to 0:06. In the midground, the hero in red armour changes in mid-stride into a knight with a cat's head, and keeps running. PEP stops sweeping and stares.

0:06 to 0:09. One continuous shot, no edit. The camera tilts down to PEP's hands and the broom. The broom turns into a giant orange carrot in his hands, then back into the broom. His fingers tighten on it.

0:09 to 0:12. PEP slowly turns from the square to face the camera, his eyes wide, and takes two steps towards us.

0:12 to 0:15. One continuous slow push-in. PEP's face fills a third of the frame height, and for this beat only he looks straight into the lens. He whispers: "Hey. You typing this? Make me the main character." Behind him the HEROES stop mid-run, one foot in the air. The film ends on his hopeful raised eyebrows.

Sound: cheerful village game music, footsteps on cobbles, a soft shimmer each time something changes, then the music drops out for his whisper. One line of English dialogue, lip-synced, PEP only.
