Camera first: medium shots at the boy's eye height, 35mm, gentle handheld. The picture is always one single full frame. Vertical 9:16.

STYLE: warm hand-painted 2D animation, soft brush textures, heavy monsoon rain, dusk blue light. No text and no logos anywhere.

CAST: KABIR, a boy of about ten, short black hair, a bright yellow raincoat with a hood, rubber boots. The DRAGONS:

about a dozen baby dragons the size of kittens, round and soft, green and orange, small wings, big eyes, soaked and shivering. The SMALLEST is pale orange with a stubby nose.

SET: a small street in heavy rain at dusk. A bus stop shelter with a tin roof and a wooden bench. One tall street lamp right beside the shelter, its single bulb glowing soft white at first. Puddles on the road.

MAP: the shelter in the middle, the lamp on screen-right of it, always in frame in the wide shots.

0:00 to 0:03. Already moving in the first frame. KABIR runs through the rain towards the shelter, a bundle of shivering baby dragons cradled against his chest, the lamp glowing beside the shelter.

0:03 to 0:06. Under the tin roof, the dragons sit huddled on the bench. KABIR spreads his open raincoat over them like a tent.

0:06 to 0:09. The lamp's bulb flickers twice and goes dark. The street turns deep blue. KABIR looks up at the dead lamp, worried.

0:09 to 0:12. One continuous shot, no edit. Close on the SMALLEST dragon's face, large in frame, its nose twitching. It sneezes, and a tiny orange spark flies up out of its nose and away towards screen-right.

0:12 to 0:15. One continuous shot. Low angle from the bench looking up past KABIR's face to the lamp bulb above him, both in the picture, his face a third of the frame height, three-quarter view, eyes up towards the bulb, the dragons on the bench beside him. The spark reaches the bulb and it slowly fills with a warm gold glow over two seconds; only that warm light grows on his face and the dragons, the rest of the street stays rain blue. He grins in disbelief. The film ends with the dragons squeaking up at the light.

Sound: heavy rain on the tin roof, splashing boots, a buzzing lamp that cuts out, a tiny sneeze and a spark crackle, happy squeaks. No dialogue. A soft hopeful piano note at the end.
