Dry satirical American medical comedy, cinematic high contrast lighting, clean clinical aesthetic, mockumentary camera with snap-zooms on reaction faces, deadpan timing. 15s.

0-4s: Slow tracking shot into a high-end LA clinic exam room. A silver-haired doctor in a tailored white coat clicks a pen, reading a clipboard. A young woman in pink athleisure sits on the exam table scrolling her phone. A young nurse in bright blue scrubs stands by the door, very serious.

4-8s: The doctor peers over his glasses. "Last one. You have seventy bucks. You buy thirty dollars of groceries. How much change does the clerk give you?" The woman does not look up from her phone. Instantly, flat: "Twenty." The doctor snaps the clipboard shut. "She's lucid. Discharge her."

8-12s: The nurse stops them, confused, counting on his fingers. Snap-zoom on his worried face. "Wait, seventy minus thirty is forty. Shouldn't she get forty back?"

12-15s: The doctor stops at the door. Slowly turns. Long deadpan stare of pure disappointment. "Brian. I think we need to admit you." Hold on the stare. The nurse blinks. The patient still has not looked up from her phone.

Style modifiers: medical comedy cinematography, clinical interior lighting, mockumentary snap-zoom, deadpan reaction timing, naturalistic dialogue, professional set design, comedy through silence, dry wit performance.
